Coaching through short form content

- Podcasts live and die by their host. They have to be good. Most people can't carry a 45 minute attention span.
- Immediately do short form content - they have thoughts that can be expanded into short form content, which can be used to build rather than replace.

- @Jeremy advocates creating native short-form content rather than clipping long-form episodes, as it's easier to edit and better for personal brand [2:24].
- Short form content as short form content rather than clipping long content into short clips.
- Clients should start with short-form content (10 seconds to 3 minutes) while developing podcast brand, then progressively expand to mid-length and full episodes [3:31].
- This constructive approach ensures clients always maintain short-form output while adding longer formats, avoiding poorly-conceived podcasts that are difficult to repurpose [4:50].
- Short-form content performance data informs long-form episode topics; high-performing short clips become building blocks for themed podcast episodes [5:53].

Core production workflow and deliverables

- @Melissa Ceden confirmed standard offer includes strategy planning, show notes, recording, editing with intros/outros/transitions, publishing to multiple platforms, and short-form clip creation [13:12].
- Show notes are AI-generated summaries reviewed for accuracy; episode plans use "fence posts" (statement-to-statement structure) rather than full scripts [19:17].
- Thumbnails and platform-specific formatting created for YouTube, Apple Music, and other distribution channels [13:42].

Attention purchasing framework and content design

- @Jeremy uses "attention purchasing" system: make a statement that buys attention, hedge on duration, land the plane and deliver on promise before moving to next point [12:11].
- Titles should be attention-grabbing rather than summative; tech clients often resist this approach but it's essential for engagement [20:31].
- @Jeremy provides frameworks to explain why specific content structures and statements are designed as they are [19:40].

Ad campaign and content distribution services (This is an extra add-on service)

- Ad service ($500–$1000) includes platform-specific ad placement (e.g., LinkedIn) running content rather than traditional ads, plus management fee and ad spend allocation [8:01].
- @Jeremy recommends 25% management fee with 75% toward ad spend but needs confirmation from Josh and Deanna [9:02].
- Ad service is content boosting, not full ad management; @Jeremy is a content specialist, not an ad specialist [10:06].

Event recording and studio setup services (This is an extra add-on service)

- Podsicle can record at batch recording sessions (quarterly) or attend live events with professional video/audio gear to capture content for funnels [14:27].

- @Jeremy builds home/work studios by installing equipment and teaching clients to use it; can provide equipment lists or purchase on client's behalf [15:49].
- Batch recording recommended for evergreen content with separate system for quick releases [17:00].

Video content and team composition (This is an extra add-on service)

- Podsicle offers video content creation beyond podcasting; @Jeremy captures on-site content and coordinates with editors or freelancers depending on availability [17:59].
- @Melissa Ceden clarified to prospect that core team (Jeremy, Melissa, Rachel) is US-based to address concerns about offshore show note quality [18:21].
